the Gardener

Calia Kammer

through this landscape only known by The Unknown

i hear the invitations—dance with Me, dear, here in the desert;

I’ll stay here swaying and leaping until the creosote and parched salt flats learn their rhythm again on the forest floor we can crawl in awe making sure to let every spiraling fungus and tender cedar needle imprint our palms and knees.

Breathe in the hints of unbirthed springs travelling deep beneath us and learn to smile at their mystery careful now, tip-toe like I do here at the old oak tree not out of timidity but as to not wake the splintered seedling curled up among the low branches

I kneel here at the mother oak’s trunk and stroke the little one’s battered buds until she is ready to wake and meet the sunrise
